The authors draw on their own experiences as journalists to provide a firsthand account of the challenges facing the free press. They show how corporate interests have increasingly come to dominate the media landscape, and how this has led to a narrowing of the range of voices that are heard.

They also discuss the growing threat of government censorship, both in the United States and around the world. They show how governments are using a variety of tactics to silence dissent, including intimidation, harassment, and imprisonment.

Finally, the authors examine the role of social media in the decline of the free press. They argue that social media has created an echo chamber in which people are only exposed to views that they already agree with. This has made it more difficult for people to get a well-rounded view of the news.
